} `IBM

} Subject: Re: Radar Detections of UFOs
From: William Ferguson
Date: 18 Nov 1994 03:41:53 GMT
Lines: 30

>I believe that mysterious blips on radar are not all that uncommon, and many >can be explained after analysis. However, I know a former air traffic >controller in the military who related an interesting story. It seems that >one mysterious sighting in the area of the Baltic Sea resulted in NATO >scrambling several jets to pursue the "unknowns", and then after the jets >arrived in the area, both the "unknowns" and the pursuing jets disappeared >from the radar screen. He said the base was on alert at this point, and a >second group of jets was scrambled, but suddenly the alert was cancelled and >all recording tapes from the control tower were confiscated by a special >security group that he had never seen before (or since). The second group of >jets was recalled, and he never heard what happened to the pilots of the first >group. Nothing was ever said in the press, but I have no reason to believe >that this person is lying, and find the reaction of the military and security >group interesting.
>
>

I am not big on UFO's myself since I never saw one. I have a friend who saw one as an 18 year old in England. He said what was frightening about it was that it was big, and so silent. He reported it to the English UFO society but they did not believe him, so he just didn't talk about it anymore.

When I was working in England I met an ex-RAF officer who was operating radar overlooking the English channel in 1948, he said they clocked something traveling at 1500 mph, and it made a 90 degree turn. No plane we have can do that at that speed. He was a believer that something was out there.

Me? I don't know, I haven't seen one. Somebody is seeing something, what I don't know.